

Mike Horner Teaching Philosophy

My teaching philosophy follows the belief that new skills are best acquired through action and reaction. Action can be a drill or other activity that gets the student to experience and feel the correct move or position being taught. The reaction is a discussion that allows the student to reflect and fully understand what they just experienced. Both are equally important and together they contribute to playing better golf.

My approach to teaching is to engage, listen, guide and motivate the student throughout the improvement process. I want people to play and enjoy the game of golf. Therefore it is important that my instruction is meaningful, fun and personalized to the student's playing goals.
